

Dr Graeme Finlayson

Dr Graeme Finlayson is the SA Arid Rangelands Ecologist with Bush Heritage Australia. He is responsible for coordinating ecological research and monitoring on South Australian reserves, which includes programs addressing the threat of rabbits. Part of his role includes the development of research collaborations with universities and other conservation agencies or NGOs, assisting with fundraising opportunities, maintaining reserve management plans and developing relevant stakeholder networks through the state.

Graeme has over 15 years experience in wildlife research throughout Australia and New Zealand, working in the private sector, government agency roles, university research positions, and with NGOs. His work has included landscape restoration projects and reintroductions.
